

Acknowledgements

This paper is based on research funded by the Joseph Rowntree Memorial Trust. I am grateful for the Trust's support.

During the course of the research, many people discussed innovative work with me, drew attention to both progress and problems, provided me with documentation, and alerted me to other initiatives and other sources. Their interest and co-operation were greatly appreciated. I owe special thanks to Derbyshire and Stockport Social Services Departments, where I had the opportunity to discuss issues with a range of officers.

I would also like to thank the members of the Advisory Group established by JRMT for the project. Their discussions and views were always stimulating and helpful to me – even if their advice was followed too rarely.

Many thoughtful and thought-provoking reactions to an earlier form of this paper were provided by members of the Advisory Group and by others. Their feedback was invaluable, and I am very grateful to all of them for taking the time to read the draft and to comment both on what was said and what might usefully be added.